

The classroom is where it happens...

For many teachers coping with specific learning difficulties in the inclusive classroom is stressful.

It is equally difficult for the dyslexic child in the classroom.

Dot Webb is a former Headteacher and Specific Learning Difficulty specialist who still works with young people. She is a dynamic, resourceful and experienced teacher who has worked in mainstream and special settings.*

Dyslexia is dead?

Whether you use the term Dyslexia or not, you still need strategies to cope with the specific learning difficulties presented by children in the classroom

Core understanding of the written word and spelling skills are central to the curriculum.

In this one-day course, Dot and Patrick Webb explore and examine current materials and teaching strategies for the classroom.

Dyslexia – Classroom Approaches

Learning should not be a closed door

The most important issue facing any school staff is how to enable young people to access the curriculum to best advantage. Specific learning difficulties can make school progress difficult and sometimes impossible. For many, the management of the inclusive classroom is made more difficult because the resources needed to work with children who have learning difficulties are not always available.

In this course, Dot and Patrick Webb look at ways of presenting the curriculum to the dyslexic learner.

Patrick Webb has been a Headteacher and Behaviour Management specialist for many years. He was awarded the OBE for services to SEN, and has worked in the mainstream as well as Special Schools.
